Frederick Hohenzollern Whimpers.

"But have I friends left?

The question is asked by Frederick William Hohenzollern, sometime crown prince of the fallen German empire.

The question itself indicates a dawning comprehension of his position before the world.

For four years this eldest offspring of William the Devil has been spitting in the face of civilization He has done nothing to win friends, everything to make enemies whose undying hatred will pursue him all his days. He sent his fellow-countrymen to death in hordes at Verdun while he caroused in safety in a stolen French château far out of bullet-range. He ordered these men to death callously to cause death and terror among the French.

The list of his offenses is long-too long to repeat. He may well ask: "Have I any friends left?"

Can such a man ever have friends?

Who wants to be branded the friend of such a slinking coward? He's amusing himself now by skating on Dutch canals Thin ice may befriend him.

Listening to the Grate Fire.

The wood-fire in the open grate.

Who does not revel in the combination?

The pictures in the flames. The musings as the fire crackles, the only sound in the stillness.

Ancients in Persia, in other lands and times, worshipped fire It was the symbol of purity, of purification.

Poets have found the fire on the heartle an inspiration.

Painters have seen pictures in the glowing coals. We see them, too, in the silence of the evening time.

But the wood-fire in the open grate is more than a symbol of purity, more than a creature comfort, more than a sign of personal prosperity, more than a setting for dream-pictures. It's a symbol of action.

It's a picture of ambition.

It's an incitement to endeavor.

The flames are never still while there's material to reach.

Reaching, reaching, grasping, keeping, never content, never idle. Action! That's what the wood-fire in the open grate is saving. The flames leap high and higher so long as there is fuel to feed them. When the fuel is consumed the flames wither and die. Ambition must be fed. That's the lesson of the fire. You can't get the fire of ambition to burn in the worker's brain to energize his hand unless it is fed, and fed again. Take away incentive, make labor ineffective, and the laborer's ambition dies.

And what is a man without an ambition? An ax without an

The mystery of the hereafter has influenced many to a deep study of subject theological. Ofttimes it liberates new thoughts, fremently it fetters minds.

Mystery enervates, it creates suspense; suspense exhausts, agitates, churns the mind.

But the mystery of what may result from experimentation and combination urges chemist and inventor to persist; keeps hope burning, calls forth energy and resourcefulness, pitches aspiration and ingenuity to the key that produces new notes of discovery.

Mystery suggests possibilities and possibilities suggest action.
